May 21, 2014 A selection of the most-read articles from the past week. Insight The internet has changed in the last decade from a place where most information was transmitted on the medium of paper to a medium that now has the power to propagate multiple sources of information in real-time. In many ways, this evolution has laid the foundation for the way we see the web today. The decentralization of content and the rapid spread of information are in many ways similar to how the internet grew into the modern web. The publication of World Wide Web 1.0 in 1990 was a landmark event. While the web as we know it today grew organically and only slowly, the internet as we know it today was built entirely by central planners and governments. New technologies have emerged to democratize creation and distribution of content and we have seen many already. The web has a unique ability to pool a source of information and use that source to create knowledge through link sharing and decentralized collaboration. That's not to say that the internet today is perfect. The web is still far from that point but it is on its way. We've seen the rise of HTML5 bring a lot of new tools to the web. Some have taken the promises of HTML5 and made them real while others are being used to reimagine how the web is built. While this may seem like an academic exercise, there are a lot of people who are using these new tools to reimagine the web in their own unique way. While it's hard to measure the full potential of HTML5, we do know that its potential is great. HTML5 is poised to change how we build the web. While we are still waiting for that day to arrive, it is no wonder that the Web Foundation has named HTML5 as a global priority. A lot of progress is being made in many different areas, some of which you can read about in this week's articles. Stratechery Richard and Harry discuss the state of the web today and the future of the web. Some of the discussion focuses on the idea of what
