LASER 4D ANALYST PRO is a Windows .In systems employing high voltage direct current (HVDC) converters it is necessary to charge electrical accumulators with energy produced by the power converter and stored in the accumulators is used to provide the power to the plant load and/or other devices. In HVDC systems, it is therefore important that the charging voltage obtained from the converter is as close to the actual voltage in the accumulator as possible. Known HVDC systems employ a set of conductors which interconnect the HVDC converter and the electrical accumulator. In conventional systems, the HVDC converter and the accumulator are connected with a single cable. As is well known, the capability of a power cable for transmitting energy to its destination depends on electrical conductivity and voltage sag characteristics. The conductivity is determined in accordance with the resistivity of the cable and the transmitted electrical power. Voltage sag is a phenomenon which occurs when alternating current is transmitted through a power cable having a high inductance and a large number of periods of the load current in each period of the transmitted current. The voltage drop on such a cable caused by the voltage sag between the positive and
