We argue that with increasing reads we are in the very early stage of sequencing. As explained above, this early stage of sequencing is characterized by a high uncertainty of the states of single bases. This is not an issue for the verification of correctness in our case, since we would expect that all the strings to be verified have their correct bases in the expected positions. The third condition is the query space condition. To achieve this we combine the query inputs for the three primers and select the positions from the sequence where all three bases are in the correct position (matching the expected value). The output string of length 3 corresponds to a position in the query space. The following example shows the three strings from the verification system as well as the query space: There is also an example on how to search in the query space. Suppose that the query space is given as the sequence to be searched. Let us pick the position at index 5, since it is a match. This condition is now included in the query. The expected output of the function QVERIFY_EXECUTE should be a 1 in the corresponding position in the query space. In this example, it is equal to the second element of the vector ([1,1,1,0,1,1]). In the last example, we simulate the unspecific impact of errors. Suppose that in the verification process the corresponding elements in the query space vector are ([0,0,0,0,1,1], [0,1,1,0,0,1,0]) and (0, 0, 1). The first element in the second vector is 09e8f5149f
