contribution to the definition of new toxicity criteria of therapeutic drugs]. In current drug development, the prerequisite of good clinical efficacy of new drugs is the absence of intrinsic toxic side effects. To achieve the desired therapeutic effect in a well-tolerated manner, therapeutic drugs, or in other words active substances or their physiologically active metabolites are bound in macromolecules, primarily proteins. These molecules are then transferred from the blood and the lymph to all tissues.
The immune system functions as an integral component of the mechanisms of defense, maintaining homeostasis. It maintains tolerance to self-components in order to prevent autoimmune reactions, but it reacts rapidly and with high specificity to foreign antigens. The combined influence of these two systems on the toxicity and side effects of drugs is still poorly understood. This article describes these interactions and presents the results of a study which was conducted in 9 volunteers to further elucidate them. Thus, the proposed model is, to a certain extent, a tentative explanation for the correlation between the development of a drug-induced immune response and the occurrence of side effects during drug treatment. It can be used to develop toxicity criteria which can be applied in practice with the use of other drugs or the same drugs in a modified form.Post-procedural coronary artery dissection. We present a case of transient coronary artery dissection after percutaneous coronary intervention. A 61-year-old man developed acute chest pain 30 minutes after coronary intervention using a Palmaz stent. Coronary angiography revealed a dissection in the mid segment of the right coronary artery. The stent was inserted successfully in the stenotic lesion.
He recovered without any complication. Coronary artery dissection is a relatively rare condition and can occur in any coronary artery without any apparent causal factor. It may be associated with in-stent restenosis and its recurrence. It should be kept in mind when coronary angioplasty is performed.I have never really understood being offended by gender specific jokes. Just because you are a part of a certain group does not automatically make your opinion more valid than someone who is not. If you don't like a joke then don't tell it. Or tell it and then laugh. If you don't want to f30f4ceada
