In this work, an object-oriented approach was used to design hydrophilic polymeric matrix systems aimed at sustaining the release of theophylline and its chemical congeners. The design of the theophylline matrix was based on the architectural characteristics of the drug and the state of the art of poly(oxy-alkylene)polycarbonate matrices. The mechanical properties of the polymer matrix systems were also addressed. The object-oriented approach starts with the construction of a simple model of a drug, in which the basic anatomical features are described. From this model, a series of structures, each describing a specific morphology of the drug (e.g. coated, non-coated, encapsulated, particulate, and so on), are designed. Once all the possible structures have been created, the drug structures are hybridized with three-dimensional poly(oxyalkylene)polycarbonate matrices to form more complex, patient-specific, drug-polymer composite materials. Preliminary experimental results show that the drug release from the prepared composite materials is sustained.Steady state kinetic analysis of the amino acid transport by Na+/taurocholate cotransporter using glutamic acid as a pH-dependent carrier. The present study was undertaken to gain a better understanding of the transport of the neutral amino acids (alanine, glycine, glutamate and glutamine) in bovine erythrocytes by the Na+/taurocholate cotransporter (NTCP) of the bile acid translocation system. Kinetic studies were carried out at steady state for the uptake of L-glutamic acid in comparison with L-alanine, L-glycine and L-glutamine. The results showed that glutamate has a similar affinity and selectivity for the transporter compared with the other amino acids. Furthermore, a pH-effect was observed with respect to the transport of glutamate (low at pH 7.3) and the NTCP-mediated uptake of glutamate was shown to be a secondary active process driven by Na+ electrochemical gradient. Therefore, the transport of glutamate
