Mukasey on Tuesday will not alter the immigration status of his two sons, who are both U.S. citizens and have been living in the country for decades. But the court's ruling could have broad implications for other parents whose children are U.S. citizens. According to a legal brief filed by the Obama administration in the Supreme Court, the court decision is "likely to have significant implications for families that include U.S. citizens." The court's ruling could affect tens of thousands of people who are currently on a "deferred action" status that gives them protection from deportation. The legal brief was part of an appeal by President Obama that was not granted by the Supreme Court on Monday. The Mukasey case involved a man named Jose M. Ramirez, who was brought to the United States from Mexico when he was a teenager and has lived here ever since. He applied for political asylum, claiming that he was threatened by Mexican police officers who wanted to kill him. He later became a lawful permanent resident of the United States. The federal court ruled in 2011 that Ramirez could not be stripped of his lawful permanent resident status. U.S. District Judge William H. Pauley III of the Southern District of New York said that Ramirez "was an alien at the time of [his] adjustment of status." The Obama administration appealed the decision to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which has a reputation as one of the most liberal courts in the nation. During the appeal, the president argued that Ramirez should not be allowed to
