The majority of lung transplant candidates have obstructive lung disease, and therefore, evaluation of left and right ventricular systolic and diastolic function is necessary to assess the suitability for transplantation. The purpose of this study was to compare the long-axis strain measures of the left ventricle in the clinical setting with those of a normal population. Methods {#Sec2} ===== The study population consisted of 32 patients [male, n = 28 (87.5%)] with no previous history of cardiac disease who underwent a trans-thoracic echocardiogram (TTE) for evaluation of suspected cardiopulmonary disease. The study population was stratified according to gender and compared with a reference population of 133 healthy volunteers ([male], n = 96; [female], n = 37). The reference population was gathered from the "normal" segment of the Mayo Clinic Echo Lab database, and had no history of cardiovascular disease or current cardiac medication use. The median age of the reference population was 45 years. Results {#Sec3} ===== In the study population, patients were older, had higher heart rates, and had a greater body mass index (BMI) compared to the reference population. The reference population was comprised of more females, lower BMI, and lower heart rate (Table 1){#Tab1}{ref-type="table"}.Table 1Differences in demographic characteristics between the study group and reference populationDemographic characteristicReference population (n = 133)Study group (n = 32)Age (years), mean ± SD54 ± 1357
