A comparison of H-2 and Mls genotypes as a function of retroviral infection in rat. Previous experiments have shown that expression of the Mls-1a gene is dominant in Mlsa/a hybrids and in some strains of rats and mice. However, the Mls-1a gene does not induce differences in the frequency of retroviral genome integration and expression in the target tissues. In an attempt to understand why a gene determines a quantitative trait, Mls-1a and H-2 genotypes were tested in F344/N rats retrovirally infected with a recombinant Moloney murine leukemia virus (MoMuLV). Retroviruses may provoke differences in the distribution of Mls-1a

Infection has been shown to (1) induce selection for a particular Mls-1a gene by cis-acting effects on gene expression, (2) indirectly select the Mls-1a gene by modifying the H-2 phenotype, or (3) act via a third gene. To test for the first two mechanisms in this system, we infected rats of the following four genotypes: (A) F344/N, (B) BN, (C) BN X F344/N F1, and (D) F1. H-2 and Mls-1a genes were determined by serology and by Southern blot analysis of a HindIII-EcoRI DNA fragment of spleen cDNA, respectively. Mls-1a expression and distribution was assessed by in situ hybridization and by measuring Mls-1a
