Learning to love oneself means that you can focus on your life instead of your flaws. You have a brilliant mind and your intelligence has been tested at many different levels. You are worthy, healthy, beautiful, smart, kind and great. You have everything that you need to succeed. The issue is, you need to learn to love yourself before you can trust yourself. Learning to trust yourself is so difficult because you are already so perfect and perfect people are too perfect. To learn to love your self you need to forget the judgement and condemnation you put on your self and your life. It is easy to realise that you are perfect when you are drunk. It is the same with drugs, you are too high to remember what you are doing or saying, but when you sober up the next day you realise all the wrongs that you have done. The same goes for depression and other mental illness. You can't see yourself clearly when you're depressed. You get blind or your judgement is so negative that you simply can't see the good in your self. It is only when you are not feeling very well that you can think about the flaws and see the good. You can't do this for a prolonged period because it might start to be detrimental to your mental health. Your personal growth is not meant to be about perfection. You are meant to be imperfect, and you can't be perfect about it all the time. This makes you a difficult person to be around because you will constantly get off track. It is impossible to always be perfect, so you need to learn to let it go. It is time to start loving you for who you are. If you want to be more likeable to people, you need to love you for who you are. A very close family member of mine says that you are like a gun, you don't need to try and put a barrel on it. The gun will shoot anyway. It
