The international. 7th International Conference on Health Policy and Administration,, Kuala Lumpur. Something was in the air when 50 corporate executives and brokers, drenched by one of the heaviest rains in decades, trudged into the nearby Ritz-Carlton Hotel for the Asia Society annual Hong Kong gala on Monday. More than a few of them were apprehensive about what might happen next, having just seen North Korea's rogue leader, Kim Jong-un, walk into the hotel. A few blocks away, a litany of national and international news media -- including CNN -- were stationed outside the hotel's gym, carefully watching what was taking place inside. The tension was higher than what typically exists between the two Koreas. The topic of an official summit between Kim and President Donald Trump has been in the news since last week, but this was the first time the two leaders -- who haven't met since 2007 -- had come in proximity for an event of this magnitude in nearly a decade. And even though the gala was conceived to be celebratory and positive, it also incorporated elements of a formal state dinner, like the red carpet and the head table. But before the official dinner began, a string of TV cameras and lighting equipment on the back patio of the hotel began to turn on, setting off alarm bells. An Asian diplomat with whom I spoke later explained that these were not American or North Korean satellites or other standard back-up systems but more of a "pistol" system that would increase the intensity of the TV lights. Suddenly, the doors to the North Korean delegation were flanked by uniformed members of the North Korean People's Armed Forces, which sat down on a table with members of the Trump administration, including Tillerson and Bolton. A North Korean security official took a seat with the group to the right of the table. It was a precautionary measure to ensure the North did not have any hidden bombs or other explosives in its delegation. "Do your preparation and follow procedure for the welfare of your
