In Drosophila, miRNA genes are organized into clusters that result from large genomic rearrangements. Nevertheless, miRNAs are expressed individually or in small clusters throughout the genome. To elucidate the molecular and functional attributes of each miRNA gene cluster, we have established a systematic approach for their assembly and functional annotation. Starting from the in silico analysis of 60% of the Drosophila miRNA locus, we focused our attention on its processing miRNA (smiRNAs) transcriptome, which comprised 912 candidates, from which 705 were experimentally validated. The resulting non-redundant dataset included smiRNAs derived from miRNA genes from all six miRNA clusters and single miRNA genes. Here, we describe the identification and annotation of miRNA gene families (MIRF), a complex assembly of miRNAs gene families encoded in tandem, that is the most common type of functional clusters in the Drosophila genome. These MIRFs can consist of closely related miRNAs with the same biological function, contributing to the large functional diversity of miRNAs. We found that distinct miRNA genes encode a very specific set of MIRF products, while the rest of miRNA genes contribute to a more diverse set of MIRF molecules. Drosophila miRNA genes are broadly classified according to their expression, biogenesis and functions. MIRFs include bona-fide piRNA clusters that are derived from some smiRNAs and are probably encoded by miRNA genes. These findings document the multiple and diverse functions of Drosophila miRNAs

Description of the Related Art A steering control device for a hydraulic power steering system has been provided with a high back pressure valve for adjusting steering oil pressure supplied to a power cylinder from a steering control valve. See Japanese Patent Application Publication No. 2009-138438. The high back pressure valve is typically placed in the supply path of steering oil from the steering control valve, and when the steering oil pressure from the steering control valve exceeds a predetermined higher-back pressure setting which is higher than a steering
