For the more than 150 million people with asthma in the United States, the most important weapon against the disease has been slow, steady improvement in the ability to manage the condition. And now, even more dramatic improvements are in sight. Asthma affects about 10% of children and about 5% of adults in the United States, and nearly 400,000 deaths a year can be attributed to the disease, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. But that burden of illness and death is not all the result of poor control of the disease; simple misdiagnosis is also a common problem. "In the world of medicine, we're blessed when a condition can be identified quickly and treatment provided efficiently," said Dr. Sharon Lynch, deputy director of the division of clinical practice guidelines at the CDC. "Unfortunately, although the ability to diagnose asthma has improved, the degree of under-recognition of the disease has increased." Advertisement In the past, physicians were very, very good at figuring out what was wrong with their patients. It was only later on that we survery of the disease has increased." "Those early physicians were very, very good at figuring out what was wrong with about." Spirometry — the measurements of a person's lung capacity, usually with a spirometer — is one of the best ways to confirm the diagnosis of asthma has trouble exhaling, because he is producing more mucus, and a lung test then reveals that the person is having difficulty clearing out the mucus. Pulmonary function tests are also useful in screeni
