I need to check if some file exists, because I need to only run a certain command if the file exist. The following one doesn't work:
#!/bin/sh if [-f file] then echo "file exists" else echo "file does not exist" fi A: -f file is not the same as file being there. You can use bash's -e: if [[-e file]]; then echo "file exists" fi Or use a double-negation of file's absence: if ! [[-f file]]; then echo "file does not exist" fi It is probably better to avoid bashism, if possible, and not rely on a shell globbing which may not be available all over the place: if ! test
