The use of calcium hydroxide for postoperative apical periodontitis treatment: a 15-month follow-up. The purpose of this randomized controlled trial was to compare postoperative healing and clinical status in root-end cavities after apical surgery filled with either a freeze-dried, calcium-containing bone substitute or a 3-week long-term calcium hydroxide paste. Forty root-end cavities were randomly assigned to receive bone substitute (0.5 to 1 g per root-end cavity) or $\text{Ca}(\text{OH})_2$ (1.5 to 2 g per root-end cavity) in permanent molars and premolars, following a single-visit approach. The clinical status was evaluated using a modified

Plaque Severity Index and a modified Sulcus Bleeding Index. To compare the two therapy groups, a study design consisting of a 1-week observation period, followed by a 3-week treatment period, was performed. Microbiological samples were also obtained to evaluate the presence of bacteria resistant to calcium hydroxide. After 1 week of observation, the Plaque Severity Index and Sulcus Bleeding Index scores were higher in teeth that were treated with bone substitute. After 3 weeks of therapy, the clinical scores indicated that the Ca(OH)₂ treatment was equally effective compared with the controls. The degree of inflammation and the bacterial counts were similar in both groups after 3 weeks of therapy. The use of freeze-dried calcium-containing bone substitute after apical surgery may be an alternative to 3-week long-term calcium hydroxide pastes in selected cases.
