What's New In?

The new incoming U.S. President, Barack Obama, has called on the U.N. Security Council to enforce the world body's ban on cluster bombs on a disputed island in the South China Sea. When he said this to the council on Saturday, Mr. Obama was speaking in a personal capacity as a citizen, but it was the first time a world leader had spoken out on the issue. The South China Sea is one of the most hotly contested issues in the world, thanks to the resource-rich waters that China has wrested from Philippine and other claimants, and the vast U.S. military presence in the region. The U.S. said it was inappropriate for Mr. Obama to give the U.N. Security Council a lecture on human rights, and accused China of "bullying" U.N. members, including the Philippines. Chinese diplomats quickly refuted the charges. Cluster bombs are credited with being highly inaccurate and often kill innocent civilians. They are illegal under U.N. rules, but some governments still use them.
