That is, he is the first 10-year-old to join the DAI since its introduction during the mid-1960s. By becoming a DAI, he has joined the international community of those with 100 percent of their genetic ancestry within one ancestral group. All of us working at the DAE are extremely happy about the quality of the genome sequences that the parents have made available to us, and we eagerly await the analyses from the twin studies. At first, these analyses will likely focus on the development of traits that are inextricably linked to the relative abundance of certain ancestral groups within an individual. For example, the list of estimated variance components is already available for height, given the known genetic variation between individuals ([@bib23]), and this variation can be dissected into the effect of the different ancestral groups on an individual's height. I suspect that this will be a crucial part of the first large-scale genome-wide association studies that we carry out in the coming years. For example, variants associated with a trait might be enriched within specific ancestral groups, but we will need to disentangle the effect of a particular variant on a trait from any confounding effect caused by whether or not the variant is shared between two individuals of the same ancestral group. That said, I am excited by the development of tools that will allow us to carry out whole-genome analyses. For example, I would like to perform a study to find genetic variants associated with the expression levels of thousands of genes. The analysis of the genomes of twins that have different heights will provide an extremely useful initial reference point, from which we can extract a list of the genetic variants that are associated with height differences between twins. These variants can be compared d0c515b9f4

A32.This invention relates to suspension systems for struts, shock absorbers, and similar suspension components, and, more particularly, to a self-contained strut having a fluid reservoir formed integrally therein. The present invention relates to a suspension system including a fluid containing strut having a piston acting to fluidly seal the strut interior. In the preferred form, the strut also includes a self-contained reservoir for providing hydraulic fluid to the piston. Most modern motor vehicles utilize struts as part of a suspension system for absorbing shock and vibrations from the motor vehicle. Struts typically include a sleeve in which are disposed a pair of fluid containing chambers. A piston is reciprocated within the sleeve by pressurized fluid contained in one chamber. The piston controls fluid flow through a passage defined in the strut. Typically, the pressurized fluid is fed into a chamber by way of a valve, such as a poppet valve. In order to provide more rigidity, some struts also include high pressure fluid sources directly connected to the strut. However, in such cases, the strut should have a relatively large volume to accommodate both the high pressure fluid and fluid for the poppet valve. However, the large volume of the strut adversely impacts the overall vehicle weight. Accordingly, it is desirable to provide an improved strut which is more compact and thus lighter. It is further desirable to provide an improved
